role of scientific knowledge as an instrument to detect and solve economic and social problems, to recognize the quality of ideas based on scientific, social and ethical criteria, and to encourage curiosity, honesty and intellectual restlessness in relation to the ideas and theories of Political Economy.

The relationship between students and teachers during the course is based on mutual trust, commitment and reciprocity.

4.2. Learning tasks

The course includes the following learning tasks:

- Lectures: They will consist of the teacher's explanations completed by the exchange of dialogues, reflections and contrast of ideas with the students. These presentations will seek the understanding of theories, concepts and basic methods of Public Economy and Political Economy. They will inform the students of the basic and complementary bibliography that is considered appropriate for the preparation and study of each topic.
- Practical cases: After the presentation of each one of the topics, a set of practical cases will be handed on the courses of Public Economy and Political Economy. Students will do research, review and analysis of documents, databases or websites relevant to complete these exercises, as well as participate in its solving in class. It is expected that students will show their analytical, methodological and reflective abilities and will be able to apply correctly the concepts, theories and methods taught by the teachers.
- Exercises and commentaries
- Seminars and lectures of external experts:
- The presentation of certain topics of investigation or of highly specialized professional knowledge will be delivered by competent professionals, who allow students to become familiar and analyze the contents.
- Tutorials: The daily activities carried out in the classroom will be complemented with tutorials, either individually or collectively, to:
 - o Clarify doubts about the contents and methods of the course
 - o Help to structure the writing and presentation of the exercises
 - o Stimulate possible lines of research in the framework of the Master's dissertation
 - o Promote the assessment of the teaching-learning context of the course

We add, to close this section, some bibliographical references that can contribute to the learning of students enrolled in Economics and politics of public intervention:
