So the methodology combines, on the one hand, the face-to-face system in the classroom (with lectures and practical sessions based on the case model, exposure and debate by the students) and, on the other hand, the autonomous work system by the student that takes place outside the classroom.

4.2.Learning tasks

The course includes the following learning tasks:

- Lectures. Activities that require the presence of the student in the classroom should conveniently alternate exhibition lectures and those based on the resolution of problems and case studies. Expository activities and systematization of knowledge by the professor. This type of activities are assigned a total of 54 hours per student and group. This type of classes provide the student with a first theoretical contact with the concepts and basic knowledge of the course that will allow him to carry out a more effective personal work and a better learning of the course, being able to train him for a more clear identification of the problems related to the person and the goods and to try to design the ways of legal solution to them.
- Practice sessions. The dynamic activities of professor and students are assigned a total of 36 hours per student and group. These sessions will promote the acquisition by the student of the transversal competence of ICT consultation for the acquisition of legal information. One of the methodologies used will be the case. Efforts will be made to promote the intervention of the student in the classroom and facilitate, in this way, to develop their ability to obtain the intended result of identification and analysis of legal problems, in addition to developing their critical sense and skill for oral presentation. In addition, in this way, the student becomes familiar with the use of the technical-legal language of the subject. Such activities can also revolve around the study and analysis of judgments issued by the courts or administrative decisions (RDGRN). Within these activities is also considered the possibility that the professor proposes, among the programmed activities, the realization of seminars of diverse content: that can consist of the active participation in the debate, moderated by the professor, on the questions raised in the readings carried out by the student; or they may consist of a reading control that allows to assess the understanding of the subject, or in jurisprudential analysis. Transversal practices may also be carried out with other courses of the degree, preferably in the first or second year.

- Autonomous work. The student's personal work outside the classroom is fundamental to their learning; It may consist, among other activities:
